(KANSAS CITY, Mo.) Sept. 9, 2014 – Investors in entrepreneurs have a special in-the-trenches wisdom gained through years of experience. This investor experience is now available to entrepreneurs and prospective early-stage investors through InvestorIQ.org, a free, online curriculum that provides knowledge essential to improving startup investment.

Investor IQ allows startup backers and founders to educate themselves on how investors decide whether to invest at all, where to invest, and how their money will be used and returned. A video series draws on the successes and failures of thousands of angel investors over the last 15 years, delving into five questions early-stage investors should ask themselves before they put money into an entrepreneurial venture.

“Financing startups is very risky business,” said Troy Knauss, angel investor and executive director of the Angel Resource Institute. “By providing knowledge about how successful investors operate, Investor IQ teaches best practices for potential investors and helps entrepreneurs understand what investors look for. Clarifying the approaches that have created winning ventures helps both groups prosper.”

Investors and startup company owners can find out how much they really know about investing by taking a 15-question quiz at Quiz.InvestorIQ.org. Based on exhaustive interviews and research into what makes some investments soar while others flounder, the quiz points out the realities of startup investing and rates the quiz-taker’s investing smarts.

The Kauffman Foundation, Angel Resource Institute and Angel Capital Association jointly developed Investor IQ as a resource and starting point to additional information for those who want to learn more about the startup investor process. The Angel Resource Institute provides deep education, data and information on the angel investment process, and the Angel Capital Association connects investors to continued professional development through the association and/or by connecting accredited investors to an angel group in their community.
